RESEARCH & SCHOLARSHIP

RESEARCH INTEREST

My research addresses two areas of sport management. In organizational behavior, I investigate how passion shapes career attraction, emotions, well-being, and turnover among sport job seekers and employees. In sport marketing, I examine fandom and team identification, particularly in digital fan communities. Because many sport professionals begin as fans, I bridge these areas by tracing how team identification carries over into career decisions. My distinctive contribution is methodological. I capture emotional responses with biometrics (e.g., galvanic skin response, EEG, facial expression analysis) and mine big data from fan and media discourse through natural language processing, topic modeling, machine learning, and content analysis. I now extend these methods to artificial intelligence, using large language models as analytic tools and testing how fans respond to AI commentators, chatbots, and AI-personalized marketing.
